Substantive Law vs. Procedural Law

Governing law can be broadly categorized into two primary divisions: substantive law and procedural law. Substantive law defines the legal rights, duties, and obligations of individuals and entities. It governs the specific conduct and activities that are permitted or prohibited. Procedural law, on the other hand, outlines the rules and procedures that govern how legal disputes are resolved. It establishes the steps involved in filing lawsuits, conducting trials, and enforcing judgments.

Conflict of Laws

In a globalized world, legal issues often transcend geographical boundaries. When parties from different jurisdictions are involved in a legal dispute, the question of which law applies arises. This is known as conflict of laws. Courts employ a set of rules to determine the governing law, considering factors such as the place where the cause of action arose, the parties' domiciles, and the relevant legal interests involved.

Choice of Law and Forum Selection

In certain instances, parties can agree to the governing law and the forum where disputes will be resolved. This is known as choice of law and forum selection. These clauses are often included in contracts and other legal agreements. Courts generally enforce such agreements unless they are contrary to public policy or violate fundamental principles of justice.

Governing Law in Law School

In law school, students are introduced to a wide array of substantive and procedural laws. They learn the principles of criminal law, constitutional law, torts, contracts, and property law, among others. Students also delve into the complexities of conflict of laws and the principles that govern choice of law and forum selection. Mastery of these governing laws is essential for success in law school and beyond.
